In the previous year alone, the Green Tech Cluster helped initiate 25 innovation projects and played a key role in generating ideas and building contacts. This tech hotspot has proven to be a job and an economic engine and is now supported by the Ministry of Climate Protection with € 1 00,000 per year.

Cluster as an important network

"The Green Tech Cluster Styria and Carinthia is a very important partner for us because it is a network, because it brings together companies, because it can provide expertise and the ministry for climate protection will therefore financially support this important regional partner with a fixed annual budget in the future, so it also formally becomes a sponsor institution of the Green Tech Cluster", said the minister for climate protection Leonore Gewessler (The Greens).

Green technologies as a growing industry

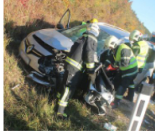

This means greater financial security for the Green Tech Cluster and a pool of strengths, said Barbara Eibinger-Miedl (ÖVP), state minister for economic affairs: "The green technology area is an industry in absolute growth. It is developing significantly better than the overall economy. We see this in both the sales figures and the number of employees. This means that we will continue to invest heavily in this sector."

A successful example is the East Styrian biomass heating system manufacturer KWB, which has tripled its sales over the past five years, says KWB Managing Director Helmut Matschnig: "85 percent of Styrian energy solutions that we will build this year is about to run out internationally, and not only in Europe, but now in all continents of the world and we are very proud of it".
